The little glass fireman that draws no pay...

TAKE a good look at this picture. For without a ladder you seldom get a close-up of a sprinkler head.

This one is said to be the last word—so reliable that industries which equip their buildings with this little “fireman” obtain low insurance rates. Users say it pays for itself.

When the heat of a fire reaches a certain temperature, the little “Quartzoid” bulb you see in the sprinkler head is shattered by expanding liquid inside it. A valve is thus released, and water is directed onto the fire.

For the engineer, there’s more to that little bulb than meets the eye. For one thing, it replaces alloys formerly used. For another, it shows how glass can now be made into accurate mechanical parts. The bulb must shatter at a specific temperature. And it must shatter completely, with no splinters to hinder valve action. Too, it must fit its hardware exactly. So it’s up to Corning to supply glass free from weakening flaws and to hold wall tolerances that can make or break the efficiency of a sprinkler head.

Fussy? Sure. But fussy and tough jobs are stock in trade at Corning. Did you know for instance that Corning makes a light globe that also protects industry because, unlike the “Quartzoid” bulb, it will not shatter? That Corning has developed industrial glasses to withstand heat that turns metals to liquid? Or that glass springs from Corning will outlast metals in fatigue tests?

These few examples give you an inkling of the growing usefulness of glass in these days of material shortages. No wonder engineers with urgent problems say “Ask Corning.” Corning Glass Works, Corning, N. Y.
